

Life in prison for publishing war crimes?

Julian Assange, Australian journalist and publisher, has been in maximum security prison in London since April 2019 as the US demands his extradition to face trial for his publications.

There is currently no verdict against him, his procedural rights have been violated and he shows symptoms of psychological torture.

The charges against him criminalise the very foundations of journalistic activity, which is why agreeing to his extradition would set a precedent against press freedom.
